

Bo Machayo

Bo Machayo is the director of federal government and public affairs for Micron Technology. He has extensive experience as a public policy and public engagement advisor at the local, state, and federal government levels. Machayo has worked on a wide range of domestic and foreign policy issues, with particular emphases on the economy, climate, and Africa. He has successfully passed legislation, formed coalitions, and accomplished organizational goals throughout his career, including as a political appointee at the White House during the Barack Obama administration.

Machayo previously worked for Senator Mark Warner (D-VA); the Loudoun County, VA, government; the U.S. African Development Foundation; the Obama White House Council on Environmental Quality; the Department of Homeland Security; and Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY). Machayo graduated from Wake Forest University with degrees in economics and international affairs, and received a master's in public administration from George Mason University. A first-generation American with roots in Uganda and Kenya, he has worked to serve his community through a nonprofit he cofounded, Global Inheritance.